Integrating Sales and Marketing to Drive Demand

A proven commercial strategy for growth in any market

Orchestrated digital and sales rep interactions deepen customer learning and lead to higher-quality deals

A seamless omnichannel customer experience and guidance from reps are important — but only when they work together to foster deep buyer learning and self-reflection necessary for productive B2B buying. As buyer journeys become more complex, commercial organizations must deliver a more integrated human and digital customer learning experience.

Breaking down silos between sales and marketing to help customers learn and buy more is an incremental process. Wherever your organization is on the journey, you can take steps to build a streamlined commercial engine.

How do you get started? In this eBook we provide:

- An outline of the desired B2B buyer experience and where sellers fit in
- The four phases of sales and marketing alignment
- The six main areas to assess for maturity
- Two real-life examples of companies that have gotten results with a unified commercial strategy

Sales organizations that prioritize alignment with marketing are nearly three times more likely to exceed new customer acquisition targets.

Separate sales rep and digital engagement stifles customer learning

To meet customers' needs across channels, chief sales officers (CSOs) take two approaches:

- Focus on talent acquisition, development and strategy by way of human-led channels.
- Increase investment on digital channels, relying on marketing to drive commercial results.

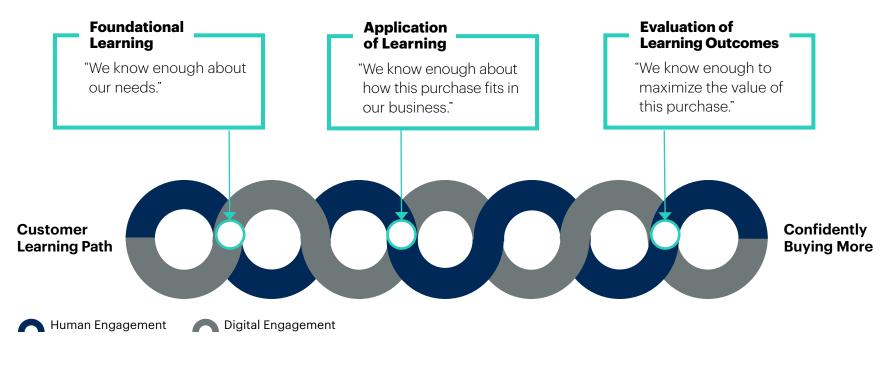

Neither approach is likely to solve the underlying problem: ineffective customer learning.

Unified sales rep and digital engagement deepens 3 stages of learning

Sales and marketing can work together to create an integrated, customer-centric commercial strategy that choreographs customer learning moments across channels.

Customers pass through three successive learning stages on the path to buying more than they expected.

How and when sellers intervene is key to deep learning

Sales reps can coordinate with marketing to deliver course-smoothing and course-changing interventions at key moments across the purchase journey. Choreographing these interventions ensures that customers progress smoothly through three stages of learning, ultimately culminating in a high-quality deal.

Customers that take the time to reflect on their purchase decision and realize something new about their own needs and goals are 16% more likely to have high confidence. Decision confidence results in a higher likelihood of completing a high-quality deal.

Where does your organization stand? 4 levels of sales and marketing alignment

Chart your path to a unified commercial strategy across four levels:

How Marketing and Sales Leaders Can Progressively Advance in Maturity Illustrative

Maturity Level 1 Strategic Alignment

Sales sets targets and owns opportunity management.

Maturity Level 2

Operational Alignment

Sales shares customer data and system access with marketing.

Maturity Level 3 Strategic Integration

Marketing and sales integrate key technology systems and jointly manage the buying journey with aligned metrics.

Maturity Level 4

Operational Integration

Marketing and sales manage the end-to-end customer journey with integrated reporting lines, resource allocation, process workflows, systems and shared metrics.

Marketing

Marketing aligns with sales leaders on strategic objectives and target segments and independently manages leads.

Marketing collaborates with sales on lead qualification and journey-aligned outreach.

Where does your organization stand? 6 main areas of maturity

To achieve the desired buyer journey, sales and marketing leaders should assess six main areas that are essential to customer-centric, go-to-market strategy:

Case study

SMART Technologies: A new way to organize

Summary: Siloed commercial operations posed a hidden yet significant threat to growth. SMART Technologies integrated sales, marketing and service silos into a single commercial engine to develop a unified go-to-market strategy with teams whose responsibilities are tied to buying jobs.

Problem

As B2B buyers increase digital and multichannel buying, siloed commercial operations led to a discontinuous purchase experience, resulting in operational redundancies, excess spend and loss of business.

Action

- Created a compelling, customer-centric change narrative to get C-suite buy-in
- Redesigned customer-facing commercial roles to align to customer buying jobs
- Combined newly defined roles into cohesive six- to 10-person teams to enable shared visibility and accountability
- Established customer-centric business processes to jointly deliver value across the customer journey

Results

- Increased year over year (YoY) revenue by about 48%, lead volume by 50% and lead acceptance rate by 35%
- Defined all customer tasks and supporting organizational activities — regardless of legacy functional responsibilities — and mapped out skills needed to execute on each to develop customercentric commercial roles
- Combined newly defined roles into cohesive teams with shared objectives to enable visibility and team leader accountability at scale

Altium

Altium: Organizing data for more transparent buying journeys

Summary: Extensive virtual collaboration among B2B buying group members adds unwanted complexity to purchase processes. Altium developed a simple external-facing tool to help marketers, sellers and buying groups track progress, build consensus and optimize interactions.

Problem

In a complex purchase journey, members of buying groups may be unsure of their progress within the buying journey or struggle to communicate decisions or questions to other members. This makes it hard for commercial teams to intervene and assist buyers.

Action

- Created a simple tracking tool editable by buyers, sellers and marketers to enable shared understanding of a purchase journey to help all parties quickly surface and resolve challenges
- Prioritized data fields to minimize the burden of data entry and increase their ease of use

Results

- Propelled Altium to increase its close rate to 80% from roughly 20%
- Shortened Altium's sales cycle by enabling commercial teams to better diagnose problems in the buying process
- Improved coordination between sales and marketing, smoothed handoffs in the commercial process and allowed more effective onboarding of new sellers and marketers
